After 15 years of experience in regulatory analysis in the government, academia and private sectors, particularly regarding water supply and sanitation, I am one of Colombia's leading experts in this subject. I was born in Bogota, Colombia and trained in law at the Javeriana University. I obtained an MSc in Regulation from the London School of Economics and then a PhD in Politics from the University of Oxford. I have an intellectual background that combines law, political science and economics, and a body of research work that includes both the analysis of utilities regulation and of structure-of-government issues. I also have a successful track record of teaching in law schools in the United Kingdom, Colombia and Central America. Recently, I served as Superintendent of Water Supply and Sanitation, where I led a team of 150 socially-minded women and men to tackle some of Colombia's most complex and pressing challenges regarding water security and circular economy issues.
